论文摘要: This dissertation develops a theory across comparative politics and international relations, called “interstate monetary security theory,” to explain the political economy of global currency competition. While recognizing the role of economic factors, this theory highlights how a number of political factors influence the inter-currency competition for superiority in the world economy. These include domestic political economic systems, defensive military alliances, and the risk of international political disputes. I tested this theory with my interstate monetary connection data and two historical cases. I then applied the theory to China’s renminbi (RMB). This study shows that some institutional mechanisms created for the Chinese Communist Party’s survival are conducive to the RMB’s rise. The RMB’s future hangs on whether China can maintain the economic development and those mechanisms.
